

Seminar

What will be the opportunities and responsibilities that new technologies bring to learning? The young have been born into this interconnected world of communication. How can they make the most of this advantage? Many teachers began their careers before the technological explosion. Should they be working side-by-side with students, guiding and learning from them? Substantial innovations and adaptations are required in learning establishments themselves. How can school leaders know what the most suitable decisions are in this process of change? What priorities should they be following? Without doubt, we need an approach that recognises digital competence as one which covers all disciplines and contributes to the acquisition of learning skills in all spheres. There should be richer, all-round communication at all levels. Above all, learners should be able to interact with one another and with educators to achieve greater awareness of their unique skills.

The language of the seminar will be English
